I graduated from a verbal school. The same night I received the tool. A silver typewriter powered by high-speed rocket fuel. The heavy masses of words I shoot forward like descending rockets fired from a supersonic spacecraft through icy fire mountains. Racing at warp speed through a gate of street my thoughts distort time and introduce into the air space of another state.
Without missing a beat, I swing around the hordes of alien creatures in the sky annihilating them with my grammar and gravitational pull of the sun. A bunch of mercs tracked me down across the universe and tried to capture but I roundhouse kicked them with my converse leaving a vapour trail of literal interpretation scriptures. A glance along my ship reveals themed series of books on the space-born shelves-combined holdings of several libraries that I switch constantly just in case of steals and discoveries. I weaponize my paragraphs in the outer space and condense the article from the aqueous vapor in the atmosphere into a blast that falls to earth with power output that of entire galaxy as the best word-mercenary you've ever seen
